In March, Will suddenly became ill. It started on a day with heavy snow. Will's father opened the door to the annexe as I walked towards it. "He's in bed," he said. "He's not feeling good. His mother is in London today."

"Where's Nathan?" I asked.

"He's not working this morning." Then he moved past me and started walking towards the house, and I knew that he was happy to leave Will with me. "You know what he needs," he called over his shoulder. I made Will a drink and pushed open the door to his bedroom. "Yes?" said a voice, quietly. "Will, are you OK?" I said. "Do you need some pills?"

"Yes," he replied. "Strong ones for the pain."

I went to the kitchen and got some pills and some water.

"Thank you," he said, quietly, after he swallowed them, and this worried me. Will did not usually thank me.

He closed his eyes, and I stood and watched him. His body lifted and fell under his T-shirt, and his mouth was open.

The snow fell and fell. Nathan came at lunchtime and gave Will some antibiotics. "Will's body can't work like ours," he explained. "If he gets an infection, his body gets really hot, and it can't cool itself down. Can you find a wet towel? We need to cool him down."
